DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS

This Italian Renaissance Eclectic public building, designed in the form of a garden pavilion has great charm and architectural dignity. It is a fine example of an attractive style applied to a utilitarian civic structure. Three graceful arches with slender columns and a low balustrade, frame a deep porch or vestibule and create a fine central entrance. This one and one-half story brick and limestone building has handsomely scaled architectural details around the front door and windows, and has a plain cornice topped by a tile roof. The two horizontal string course mouldings at the window sill and first floor level are made continuous around the side-walls, adding a unifying element to the architectural design.

It is a charming pavilion located in an attractive site, closely related to the surrounding Botanical Garden and adjacent to Prospect Park. This is an important example of a civic structure which combines good building materials with a design which is highly appropriate for its setting.
